

UC SANTA BARBARA

THE Current

August 15, 2016

Nora Drake

A Guardian of Global Rights

Though most of us agree with the noble goals of human rights campaigns, there are many competing opinions about how to best organize an effective social movement. And Alison Brysk has heard them all.

A preeminent scholar working in the field of human rights policy and practice, the UC Santa Barbara professor has written or edited 10 books and published numerous papers and articles about effective strategies for creating large-scale social change.

In more than two decades of research into human rights issues, from torture to trafficking, she has learned not only what makes a human rights crusade successful, but also how a regional injustice can become an international cause that eventually leads to lasting global change.

For her outstanding work in human-rights scholarship and mentoring, Brysk, the Mellichamp Professor of Global Governance in the Department of Global Studies at UCSB, has received the International Studies Association's (ISA) 2015-2016 Distinguished Scholar in Human Rights Award. Representing over 100 countries, ISA has more than 6,500 members worldwide and is the most widely known and respected scholarly association in the field. The Distinguished Scholar Award recognizes an individual whose "lifetime achievements in scholarship, teaching, and mentoring have made a significant impact on the field of human rights."

"This award signifies leadership of a community of scholars, which is incredibly gratifying," commented Brysk, who is also interim chair of UCSB's global and international studies department. “It’s bigger than me, and it recognizes the power of the pen to save people’s lives.” Brysk, who has watched the field of human rights scholarship grow immensely over the past 25 years, is also a past recipient of a Woodrow Wilson Fellowship and of two Fulbright awards.

“Alison Brysk has been working in the field of human rights scholarship since its inception, and so she is certainly deserving of this award recognizing her accomplishments in research, writing, and student mentorship,” said Leila Rupp, interim dean of social sciences at UCSB. “The work she does goes beyond academia and into the realm of social issues that have lasting, worldwide impact.”

Brysk said she is especially proud of her work with doctoral students in the U.S. and abroad, and considers herself a “global mentor.” She has taught all over the world —Spain, India, Sweden, Austria — and has twice participated in a training program for Latin American indigenous community leaders sponsored by the United Nations. Many of her graduate student mentees have gone on to publish books and to work in the field of human rights and social issues.

“To me, mentorship is nurturing and accompanying students on the academic journey of producing human rights scholarship that expands our knowledge and our vision of the field,” explained Brysk. “Part of what I am trying to do in teaching and mentoring is to foster global citizenship.” She challenges her students to place their research in a historical trajectory and to appreciate and question global context.

As for her own role in worldwide human rights struggles, Brysk said she believes deeply in the importance of thoughtful scholarship on social issues. “Though I am supportive of social movements, I see the value of my role in doing a good and careful analysis of useful approaches to the problem and providing that to the organizations,” she said, describing the unique difficulty of having a front row seat to many of the world’s injustices.

Though her research into issues such as honor killing, torture and war crimes can be “depressing at times,” Brysk takes a nuanced approach to determining whether a particular human rights campaign or social movement is effective. “Success in the human rights world does not mean solving all of your problems,” she said. “It means changing government so that there is accountability and rule of law.”

Brysk plans to keep educating and raising awareness about human rights through her research and through continued support of students around the globe. “The most common misperception is that human rights is about other people, or happening somewhere else,” she said. “Human rights is present for all of us. It’s part of our lives. We are all participating in the problem or the solution in ways we don’t even realize.”

About UC Santa Barbara

The University of California, Santa Barbara is a leading research institution that also provides a comprehensive liberal arts learning experience. Our academic community of faculty, students, and staff is characterized by a culture of interdisciplinary collaboration that is responsive to the needs of our multicultural and global society. All of this takes place within a living and learning environment like no other, as we draw inspiration from the beauty and resources of our extraordinary location at the edge of the Pacific Ocean.