

UC SANTA BARBARA

THE Current

April 30, 2018

Andrea Estrada

‘Spontaneous Overflow’

In the preface to his “Lyrical Ballads,” William Wordsworth described all good poetry as “the spontaneous overflow of powerful feeling.” April is National Poetry Month, and to celebrate this auspicious literary occasion The Current is highlighting some of the campus’s resident wordsmiths.

Throughout the month, we have published pieces by faculty and staff poets whose work has been recognized nationally and internationally.

We conclude today with two poems by Sojourner Kincaid Rolle, community coordinator for the Center for Black Studies Research.

Here are the poets we’ve already highlighted: George Yatchisin, Rick Benjamin, George HS Singer, Yunte Huang, Shirley Geok-lin Lim, Swati Rana, Robert Krut, John Ridland, Stephanie Batiste and Teddy Macker.

The Mockingbird's Song

A Song of the Singers’ Singer

Remembering Clyde Woods

It was after the flags had been lowered -

We lifted our heads to watch this insistent warbler marveling at his timely retinue;

a rigorous rendition involving runs and several turns in the air.

and then he was silent against the voluminous sky

He dipped down as if to bow and then,

displaying the smooth white feathers

beneath his wings,

He gently soared away

Leaving us in awe-struck contemplation and proud.

We, friends, colleagues, protégés - we all loved him after a manner.

For the moment, we would survey his gifts to us — personal and everlasting.

Random encounters in the ivied corridors, fortunate and precise moments in the tome-packed cubicles - very few places to sit, precious little space to talk.

We would also consider his innumerable contributions to the academy and to the community of us all.

A certain numbness blunted any thoughts of depth or profundity.

We were a flock in sorrow.

Our swollen eyes and streaked faces spoke what our tongues could not broach.

Our aimless wander from arm to arm to touch or embrace or kiss - to share that sad and soulful knowing.

We each had lost an irreplaceable friend.

Each of us carried our own piece of his soul.

Each of us knew a part of his song.

He was a singer's singer able to pull the lyrics from our muted hearts and show us how our own self could sound.

He was a blues man

He had seen the Blues people the gathering of poor people the pain on their faces the substance of their existence and traveled into the heart of their pain ascertaining and deconstructing their songs singing them back in mellow tones even the heartless could hear.

He was a soul man of unordinary coolness - born on the Mason-Dixon line; bred in the East, refined in the West, he navigated the cultural plains claiming his own territory singing his song of songs.

He was a man of letters with a common man's sense could listen to the illest rhymes on the street then run them down with a philosopher's beat

He was a man who cared about the least of us and we, we who learned his song now sing our parts. We are the singers.

Across the plains; across the terrain, across the diaspora, we sing his song - our song.

We Have Come To Now

(For the Women's Center on its 40th Anniversary)

The Then The Now The When

The Me The You The We

The What The Why The How The Will

The Bruised The Battered

The Disillusioned The Disenchanted

The Solitude The Struggle The Silence

The Talk The Listen The Trust The Share

The Fear, The Pain, The Secrets The Shame

A Closet A Nest A Lounge A Home

The Open Door The Sages The Wisdom

Mothers Mentors Sisters Lovers

“Our Bodies, Our Selves”

The Strengthening

The Emboldening

The Standing Strong

“A Room To Call Our Own”

Our Own Stories Our Own Images Our Own Songs

Our Poets Our Authors Our Womanist Articulators

A Base A Foundation A Platform

“Our Own Piece of Ground”

The Visionaries The Leaders The Enablers

The Survivors The Overcomers The Thrivers

Our Unbound Feet Our Unbridled Breasts

Our Untangled Tongues Our Unfettered Feminism

Our Uncontained Joy

The Remembering The Experiencing

The Imagining

The Causes The Initiatives The Gained Ground

The Garnered Concessions The Continuous Strive

We Claim Our Right

“We Take Back the Night”

The Sanctuary The Refuge

The Ever-present Light in Trouble

A Leg A Hand An Arm A Bridge

To There From Here To There

Our Higher Hopes

Our Wilder Dreams

Our Greater Aspirations

To Live To Express To Choose To Love

“And Still [We] Rise”

— Sojourner Kincaid Rolle

George Yatchisin

Against Personification

An asylum is just an empty room with the right kind of people in it.

But then so’s a classroom

so I’ll forgive

this one its tiny size and the students' sighs, large as an asteroid out hunting dinosaurs.

If it's mean of me to make them eke out their poetry in pencil lead I'll be that sumbitch, be the cruel and human Cenozoic slamming into the Mesozoic like a glacier shaving conifers to razor stubble.
I'll never get over being surprised their youth still offers flits of wisdom, lines they don't know enough to die for. It couldn't have been a happy first fish to sprout legs, mount land, gasp at the inexcusable air of a wondrous new world.

— George Yatchisin, communications coordinator, Gevirtz Graduate School of Education

Rick Benjamin

To My Doppelgänger

You sit on the curb without knowing what you are going to do while I start climbing a tree toward a nest I will never actually find. You, you're of a mind to follow directions, rules, to be dutiful before authority. I disobey, routinely fail to read instructions, walk away when someone else tells me what to do.
We're both walking the same road, that's true, without having any idea of where we are headed. You ask each person you meet for directions, anxious for answers, while I enjoy getting lost, forget where I meant to travel, land in someone's kitchen drinking tea. You have grown tired of me, always leading you to another path you'd rather not have followed, while I'm still trying to please you.

After all, we come from one nest.

— Rick Benjamin, adjunct professor of comparative literature and of environmental studies

George HS Singer

Well Met, the Light

Every second, all hours, lifelong Like a bat on the wing the mind chirrs and pings even wanting to want-- desperate to locate itself with itself. And so for these groceries: Praise.
No need to instruct-- my arms know their craft, hefting the cabbage and apples in the grocery bag lugging the jug of milk as it sloshes. Ambling too—long bones hinge and unhinge at the knee, muscles clench and release in synchrony, unthought though each step is a fall.

Breath needs not ask to enter and leave the way children come and go freely in and out the doors of a kindly home for years.

And light too is well met. Eyes apprehend the sun as it tessellates through the scud and spindrift on the Sound—no need to ask how.

The know-how lodges deep in the brain stem, the neural webs that intend blink, swallow, and breath.

They flare and craft walk, they pulse and form see, they link their billion nodes and conjure this sense of a me.

— George HS Singer, professor in the Gevirtz Graduate School of Education

Yunte Huang

To Be An Asian Poet

To be or not to be

That's out of the question

Between Asia and America

I choose the life of a poet

Between English and Chinese

I prefer the authenticity of translationese

Between black and white

I have no choice but be yellow

Between truth and lie

I would rather get high

Between real and unreal

Well, it depends how I feel

I'm a Chinese poet on Angel Island

A Japanese poet in internment camps

A Filipino poet in sugarcane plantations

A Korean poet in LA riots

An FOB poet on Boeing 747

A Transcontinental poet on World Wide Web

A restaurateur poet in Alabama

A Language poet in Buffalo

A coolie poet at Harvard Yard

An academic poet in Santa Barbara

A funny poet in my kids' schoolyard

A chicken poet in the year of the Dog

When they ask me

What kind of 'nese are you

Chinese, Japanese, or Vietnamese?

I ask them

What kind of 'keys are you

Yankee, donkey, or monkey?

I singsong

When they ask me to sing a song

I tango

When they call me Tang O

I write a locu

When they ask for a haiku

I write poems for fortune cookies

Where they expect to read

"A Great fortune is awaiting you!"

"You are a talented person"

Or "You are so beautiful!"

I put in "Watch out!"

"We know what you did last summer"

Or “April is the cruelest month”

Where they want to find

Their superlotto numbers

I write in the amount they will lose

To be or not to be

That’s out of the question

Between Asia and America

I choose the life of a poet

Between English and Chinese

I prefer the taste of translationese

Between black and white

I want to be a rainbow

Between truth and lie

I can usually get by

Between the real and unreal

I prefer the impossible

— Yunte Huang, professor of English

Shirley Geok-lin Lim

Learning to Love America

because it has no pure products because the Pacific Ocean sweeps along the coastline because the water of the ocean is cold and because land is better than ocean because I say we rather than they because I live in California

I have eaten fresh artichokes and jacaranda bloom in April and May because my senses have caught up with my body my breath with the air it swallows my hunger with my mouth because I walk barefoot in my house because I have nursed my son at my breast because he is a strong American boy because I have seen his eyes redden when he is asked who he is because he answers I don't know because to have a son is to have a country because my son will bury me here because countries are in our blood and we bleed them because it is late and too late to change my mind because it is time.

— Shirley Geok-lin Lim, professor emerita of English

Swati Rana

Plane Ride After 9/11

Sash is half

down to block the sun

coming out instead of its reflection

in the ocean.

Waves are still moving minutely like sand. A boat blemishes hills of water, more boldly shaded by the drag of clouds. Where ocean ends and sky

begins, can't say,

a heavy ledge

then lighter grey retreating. Clouds mount the horizon, soundless, aroused by a wide mad expanse.

The coast intrudes,

casts an edge,

but the sun is driving

up the mouth of an estuary.

This is where we begin to exist

upon the fetid soil, its long cultivated skin,

the effort of order exerted

on a landscape.

A furious shine passes over lakes, ponds, metal siding.

The plane slants aside till the earth's face

meets mine,

horizon climbs up

then down again through clouds, cavernous breath. Spit out,

we break from land

traces, abridged

sky. The hot cabin is like waking from a restless

night, window

closed too tight—

Suddenly

I see another plane fly in the opposite direction, occult

mirror of the sky

briefly revealed to contain

our own precarious situation. I see myself peering

from below a half downed sash,

brown skin,

a kind of terror.

—Swati Rana, assistant professor of English

Robert Krut

Divinity

Virus-blind, you stumble to an alley, under a lentil rainstorm, a preacher waves rudder arms to the thunder, makes lightning scatter until five canaries escape his sleeves, singing condolences, a misdirection from the transistor radio around his neck, beneath his vestments, its zealous torque fusing electrodes to your breath, turning thoughts to words, your face a cannon, and the realization that he was merely a collection of discarded nightclub flyers lifted by wind between graffitied walls.

— Robert Krut, lecturer, UCSB Writing Program

John Ridland

To the Brave Generation

Who have been fired on, and march now for their lives

Those who should lead this land of the free and the brave,

Who should have led you, must now themselves be led

By you who learned too early what it is to give

A life, or rather, to have it taken away

For no good reason except that it was there

For the gun and the shooter who could shoot anywhere,

Who had no image of what it means to live,

Moved by a spirit angry as it was dead.

You learned how easily night can shadow day
By pulling a switch, a trigger. You survive, You have been tested by fire, and chosen to save Our nation from itself: you'll be The Brave Generation, and the Free, who can keep us alive.
— John Ridland, professor emeritus of English

Stephanie Leigh Batiste

Fray

Loops remain.
Remnant of the tangled thread Memory restored to the past, the present
threads forth across the knot Restored towards prismatic being.

Losing One

Losing one's mother is like losing your root.
being unattached to the world to history

yesterday now and the day before are doubtful perhaps not having been at all tomorrow

a wall of static beyond it a tear that might swallow and you wonder perhaps is it possible

no longer to belong to this planet.

Is it even still spinning...

— Stephanie Leigh Batiste, associate professor of Black studies and of English

Teddy Macker

The Otter and the Seaweed

This is what you need to know:

you need to know that otters wrap themselves in seaweed so they won't, while sleeping at night, float out to sea...

Are you imagining this?

Can you see the otters actually doing this?

Does it break your heart a little?

Does it seduce you just a bit into loving more this odd hard world?

Oh otters, wrap yourselves tight! And sleep, exactly like you do, floating but seaweed-held in our salty living waters! Oh otters, wrap yourselves tight! And you, the one who doesn't, the one who doesn't tether himself down right, we are with you as you float away, we are with you as you sleep and lose yourself in the night.

On This Earth

after a line by Mahmoud Darwish

We have on this earth what makes life worth living:

the perfume of a sleeping child, the four rain-colored wings of the dragonfly, the hourglass on the black widow's belly pouring blood into blood. We have the mineral green innards of cucumber, rain-pocked snow, the plastic crucifix on the sick whore's wall, sincerer than any cathedral.
We have an alley of poplar trees and road-darkened feet, bats sipping clear water from a dwindling creek, we have slices of black bread at a blue table by the sea.
We have on this earth what makes life worth living,
what makes it so queer and lovely and painful, moon on the snake in the dying rosemary, and the young couple upstairs in bed undressing each other regardless.

— Teddy Macker, lecturer, College of Creative Studies

About UC Santa Barbara

The University of California, Santa Barbara is a leading research institution that also provides a comprehensive liberal arts learning experience. Our academic community of faculty, students, and staff is characterized by a culture of interdisciplinary collaboration that is responsive to the needs of our multicultural and global society. All of this takes place within a living and learning environment like no other, as we draw inspiration from the beauty and resources of our extraordinary location at the edge of the Pacific Ocean.